Memories of St. Michael's

By FATHER JOHN TALBOT SMITH

Dramatics

The College Faculty was shrewd enough to direct these mental energies by means of the usual societies. And these societies effervesced, boiled over on the two holidays, Washington's birthday and St. Patrick's Day. Although I was never conscious of racial or national antagonisms on those days, I imagine the faculty often feared trouble and did much to avoid it. For example, I wrote a play for February 22nd, with the scene at Valley Forge, in which General Washington took a drink on a cold morning at the nearest canteen and then denied it—for the good of the service. The idea was burlesque of course and was used later by Bret Harte, but the faculty would not let the thing be played—for the good of the service I suppose. I wrote a comic opera for St. Patrick's Day called "Boycotting," the theme taken from that Irish scheme to which the suffering Captain Boycott gave his name and earned a place in the dictionary. The music was taken from Gilbert and Sullivan. Father Murray led the orchestra, eminent clergymen of the present day were singers, and the enterprise went with a vim unknown to college entertainment. The time we spent on these shows might have been spent to better purpose, but I look back at the joy of them, at the friendships they made, the ties they strengthened, the colour they gave to life. I have no regrets, except for the boys who missed or miss our innocent and stimulating fun. The modern system of education, based on the scientific studies of the agents of capitalism, aims at many things, and in one they are quite successful, in killing all the joy that should accompany the training of the young.

The Faculty

The faculty of that time were a positive set of men. John Quinlan taught the Rhetoric class, and he would argue over the quantity of a syllable as if the fate of a nation hung on the result. He was very critical and distrustful of the American Republic, and his passing remarks led to many a hot discussion in class. Once we trapped him absolutely. In the Tilden-Hayes controversy of 1876, when it looked like another war, as if the two candidates for the Presidency would start another war, Mr. Quinlan inadvertently admitted before the class that the situation was serious, and that if the American constitution stood the strain, its strength and durability could never again be questioned. He was quite certain that there would be war, that Europe would intervene, and that the public would be split up into two or three or even four sovereignties, whose mutual jealousies and rivalries would free Europe from further apprehension. As history tells us, President Hayes took his seat peacefully, the constitution stood the strain, and Mr. Quinlan could never open his mouth again on that point without a reminder. He was a charming man, an enthusiastic student, a true friend of the boys, and a fine professor. He had a mate in Professor Heenan of the Belles-Lettres class, mildest and kindest and fairest of men, who never allowed political discussion in class and was looked upon as a great critic in literary matters. The most potent character of that time, however, was Mr. Ferguson, the prefect of recreation, the Czar of the study-hall, the man who kept order, and who made or unmade student officials with the swiftness and indifference of Henry VIII. The study-hall looked like a lady's parlor under his eye; escaping the campus while he was on duty amounted to suicide; and to be discovered breaking the law meant a dolorous way of lines, solicitude, enmity, public scorn and ostracism, at which we hollered and then laughed. His vocation was the army, but he died a school teacher, and his influence was very marked on the discipline. On the whole, the faculty stood for a fairly good course in English and Latin, and a decent training in all other matters. They are a gentlemanly lot, entering upon old age now with dignity and the respect of their associates.

Student Activities

We were an innocent crowd compared with the boys of the present time, who are born with ears like an Indian's, eyes that see everything, and a nose for the forbidden, which only our modern press, with its multitudinous odors, could develop. The extent of their unwholesome knowledge is appalling. We had none of it. We were mischievous and troublesome. Perhaps the monotony of a walled life upset us, and something had to be done for relief. Bill Brady was a hero in the great pie steal, when a band of raiders stole the entire batch for the next day's dessert, and subjected the rest of us to runes. The night air and the dormitory air were redolent of pie for a week. Everybody was on the trail of the hidden pie, but arrived only to gather the crumbs. Then the raiders fell out among themselves and came to blows.
